Like many of his classmates at Duke Kunshan University, first-year student Alberto Najarro struggles learning the Chinese language. After spending an average of two hours each day on his studies, he can now write short essays in Chinese.

But these challenges pale in comparison to what Najarro experienced growing up in El Salvador, one of the most dangerous countries in Central America.

On Najarro's eighth birthday, his grandmother and mother were robbed by gangsters when driving to a store to buy drinks for his birthday party.

"They took away the car, mobile phones and all valuable stuff. Grandma and mom were left midway on the highway and only with the help of passers-by were they able to report to the police and then go home."
